

Dear parents,

This week we continued to explore literature through art and dramatic play. Our inspiration was The Mitten by Jan Brett. In the story, Baba knits her grandson Nicki a pair of white mittens. Nicki goes out to play in the snow and drops one of the mittens. The mitten then becomes a haven for a collection of forest animals. Picture books are a great way to introduce new, rich vocabulary: “Nicki saw a white shape in the distance. It was the lost mitten silhouetted against the blue sky.” We talked about these and other words that were new to the children.

We had fun bringing the story to life in a variety of ways. The children stitched their own white mittens and added them to the finger-painted winter sky they painted last week. The mittens are now silhouetted against their blue skies. In addition to recreating the story with a child-sized mitten and a collection of small animal toys, the kids had a ball acting it out at circle time. A white sheet became Nicki’s mitten, and our little and not so little animals huddled up inside until, tickled by the mouse’s whiskers, someone let out a giant sneeze. Your children can tell you what happened next.

A Pair of Socks by Stuart J Murphy is another wonderful story we read this week. A striped sock searches for its match. We talked about a “pair” of mittens and many things that come in pairs, or two’s: “socks”, “mittens”, “gloves”, “boots and sneakers”, and “ears and eyes”. At circle time we played a matching game with real mittens and socks.

The Alphabet Mystery by Audrey and Bruce Wood continues to be a class favorite. Inspired by the book the children are stamping ABC’s and adding alphabet stickers to Charley’s “rocket ship pencil”, pink birthday cakes, and Giant M’s castle! Everyone contributed a block to build Giant M’s castle at circle time (see photo)!

Here is a read aloud of The Alphabet Mystery:

And the busy week was capped off by school photos today. Your children were excited, well behaved and exceptionally cute!

Wishing you all a good weekend,
Andrea, Meegan, and Kate
